

ABSTRACT

Two amplifier transistors are arranged in parallel and a current source is connected to a common emitter line of the amplifier transistors and produces a temperature-independent quiescent current. In order for both the small-signal gain and the large-signal response to be independent of temperature, the emitters of the two amplifier transistors are connected to one another by a compensation resistor which has a negative temperature coefficient.